

Complete English-Russian Dictionary ("Полный Англо-Русский Словарь") by A Alexandrow, 1909, 5th Edition, Revised & Enlarged.

Large massive tome, measures 10 ½" x 7 ¼" x 1 ½" and weighs over 3 lbs. 908 pp, hardcover. Published by the General Staff of the Russian Armed Forces, printed by the Military Printing Factory in the General Staff Headquarters building, St. Petersburg. The Russian text is printed in pre-reform Russian orthography containing currently obsolete letters. As evidenced by the title page, the dictionary used to belong to someone Al. Pogozheva who, as other books in our possession suggest, possibly lived in New York in the 1920s. So, this dictionary could probably tell us quite an emigration story if only it could talk!

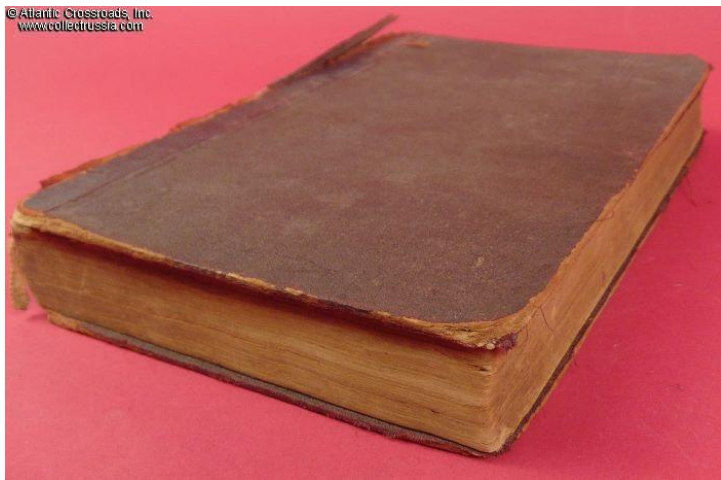

In good condition. Despite the front cover board completely separated from the binding and the spine mostly missing, the binding itself is sound and perfectly functional. The back cover board is still attached to the gauze of the binding. The corners of the cover have the board exposed and a little frayed but the book is quite repairable and can also be used "as is" with due caution. The paper of the internal pages is still mostly intact and supple and whatever little wear they have acquired does not reach the text and is not really detractive. In our test, opening the pages in any part of the tome did not lead to any trouble with the binding or anything else.

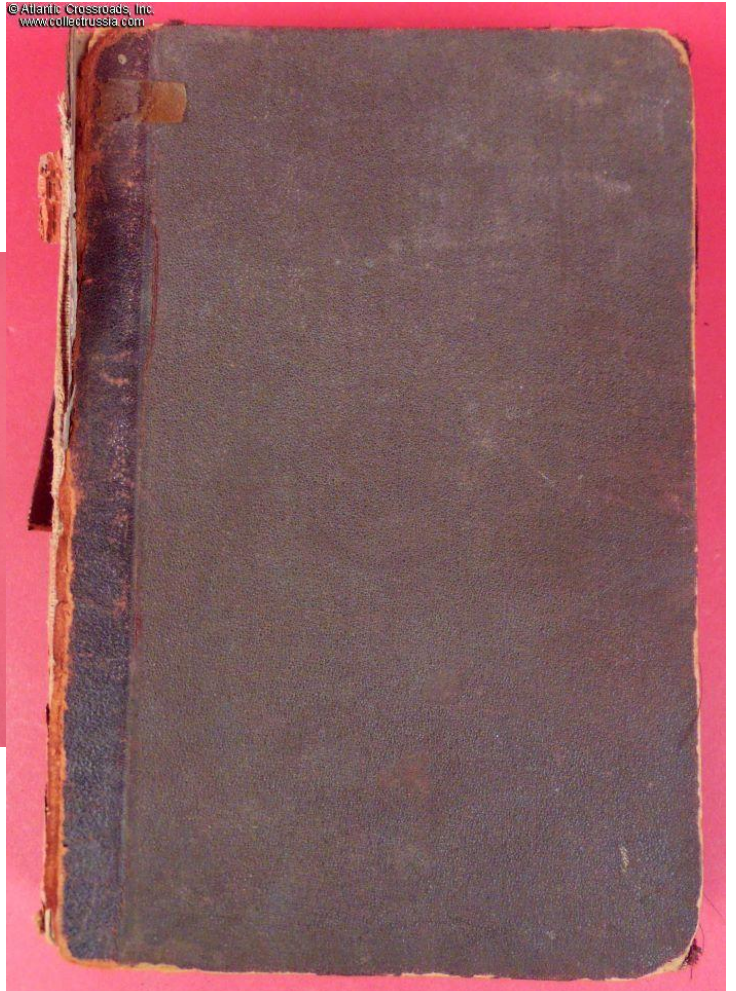

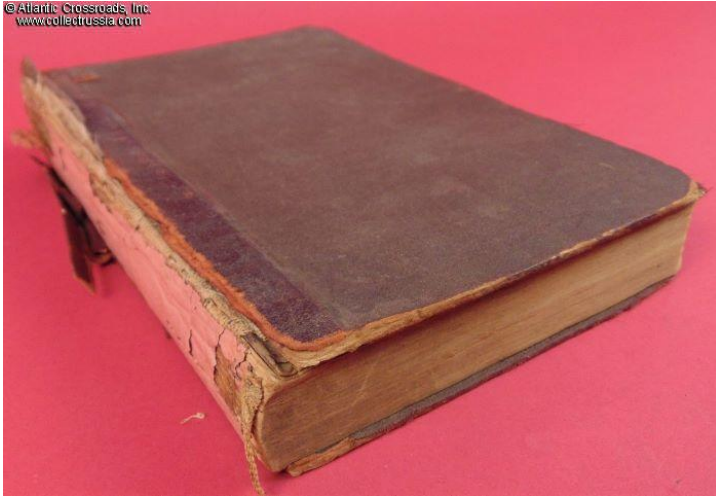

Besides being perfectly functional in its main role, this dictionary is an invaluable source of archaic words and expressions in both English and Russian. A true gift from the past for a historian or a linguist.

Please note that the pen in our photo is for size reference.
